Chapter 2

alf way between West Egg and New York the motor road hastily joins the railroad and aside it for a quarter of a mile, so as to shrink away from a certain desolate area of land. This is a valley of ashes — a fantastic farm where ashes grow like wheat into ridges and hills and grotesque gardens; where ashes take the forms of houses and chimneys and rising smoke and, finally, with a transcendent effort, of men who move dimly and already crumbling through the powdery air. Occasionally a line of gray cars crawls along an invisible track, gives out a ghastly creak, and comes to rest, and immediately the ash-gray men swarm up with leaden spades and stir up an impenetrable cloud, which screens their obscure operations from your sight. But above the gray land and the spasms of bleak dust which drift endlessly over it, you perceive, after a moment, the eyes of Doctor T. J. Eckleburg. They are blue and gigantic — their irises are one yard high from a pair of enormous yellow spectacles which pass likely to fall. If she saw me out of the corner of her eyes, she leaned slightly forward, then she laughed, an absurd, charming little laugh, and I... She laughed again, as if she said something very witty, looking up into my face, promising that there was no one else who could see it. This was a way she had. She hinted in a murmur that it was I (I've heard it said that Daisy's murmur was only elegant criticism that made it no less charming.)
